Throughout the past forty years, this company has a sustainable competitive advantage by developing their marketing mix which includes product strategy, pricing strategy, promotional mix, and distribution strategy. This brand audit aims to analyze Gatorade's marketing mix, and examine how it varies when it targets multicultural consumers. Or in other words, how its marketing strategy varies when it applies to an international market. Executive Summary Gatorade is an extremely popular sports drink brand and has outstanding brand awareness and loyalty. Its markets its unique products mainly to pre- - adult group who ages from 13 to 24. As what John Sicher, the editor of Beverage Digest, said, the pre- - adult years are the cutting edge of where these sports drink brands are competing. This is a tough market for any company to communicate with, since the youth people nowadays prefer to avoid traditional media outlets. In order to overcome this obstacle, Gatorade tends to be not only a sports drink distributor but a lifestyle company, promoting an active and self- - improvement lifestyle. In order to reach its target market, Gatorade adopts a very competitive marketing mix to get its products sold. First of all, Gatorade spends a lot of money on the product innovation and development. Secondly, its low- - pricing strategy makes the products more welcomed by the consumers. Thirdly, by using its parent company PepsiCo's distribution system, Gatorade can get its products sold in the supermarkets, liquor stores, department stores, and so on. Besides, Gatorade's promotional mix which includes advertising, public relation planning, sales promotion and sponsorship, and personal selling, also contributes much to its dominating 80% market share in the whole industry.
